Field of the Invention This invention relates generally to golf ball impact viscoelastic devices, and in particular to elastomeric thread wound golf balls and methods for manufacturing the same. 2. Description of the Prior Art Golf balls, which consist primarily of a hollow sphere covered with one or more layers, are classified as a two piece golf balls or a multi-piece golf ball. The two-piece golf ball, which is the most popular of all types of golf ball, consists of an inner core and an outer cover. The multi-piece golf ball, on the other hand, consists of several layers between the inner and outer covers. A thread wound golf ball, on the other hand, typically consists of an inner core, an intermediate fluid layer or thread wound layer, an outer cover, and a thermoplastic thread wound intermediate layer. The United States Golf Association (USGA) has established golf ball rules under Title 36 of the Code of Federal Regulations, which provides that golf balls weigh not more than 1.620 ounces, have a maximum diameter not less than 1.680 inches, a coefficient of restitution of at least 0.800 under a velocity of 120 feet per second, and a dimple coverage of at least 46%. The USGA has also established standards for the moment of inertia of a golf ball. USGA rules provide that the value of the moment of inertia about the horizontal axis (Z-axis) should be not less than 0.0035 ounce·cm<sup>2</sup>, and that the value of the moment of inertia about the vertical axis (Y-axis) should be not less than 0.0125 ounce·cm<sup>2</sup>. One way to improve golf ball impact resistance or durability is to optimize the coefficient of restitution. Many attempts at optimizing the coefficient of restitution have been made by those skilled in the art. However, there are some standards established by the USGA, such as those provided above, that limit the amount of control that can be exercised. Optimizing the moment of inertia has been found to be another way to improve the durability of a golf ball. For instance, U.S. Pat. No. 5,820,488 to Ebert discloses optimizing a moment of inertia about the Z-axis so that the moment of inertia about the Z-axis is between 0.0035 to 0.0054 ounces·cm<sup>2</sup>
